

Revising my major assignments has been one of the best things I could've done to improve my writing throughout this semester, especially after receiving feedback from my fellow classmates and my professor. I remember after the first draft of Major Assignment One looking at all the mistakes I made and looking at everything I was told to do differently next time. During this time, I didn't have a good amount of knowledge on the expectations for the assignment. For example, having to make the assignment multimodal and having to incorporate frameworks was something I had very little to no knowledge on prior to this semester. After receiving feedback and revising the assignment in the next two drafts, I ended up receiving a good final grade for the assignment. In conclusion, revision can be the difference between someone getting better or worse as a writer, because without knowledge on how to improve, people don't get better.