

As a writer, I feel that the amount of power I have over my literacy journey and how it changes going forward has been greater throughout this semester. This is likely because I wasn't aware of how much of this power I had to begin with. Because of how much I've improved in different areas and being willing to accept feedback and new knowledge, I've gained positive control over my writing. It seems that what other people had to say and what other people have told me has given me more power over my writing and power to make it better. It's important to understand that as a writer, the power can't just come from the person producing the literature, there needs to be input from other people in order to understand how to make literature presentable and how to make it make sense. I'm thankful now that I'm more aware of my potential as a writer and how much power I have over my literacy journey.
